The primary aim of this study was to identify barriers that prevent physicians in Nepal from following treatment recommendations made by the National Tuberculosis Control Program. A total of 1,019 questionnaires were distributed to physicians in 203 randomly selected public-sector health facilities and 619 of these were returned. Of those respondents, 28.2% stated that they did not follow the National Tuberculosis Control Program recommendations. The major reasons cited for this were financial constraints (30.8%) and inadequate personnel (17.2%). The data indicate that the National Tuberculosis Control Program needs to make more comprehensive efforts to ensure that physicians, who are the first line of defense against tuberculosis, are supplied with equipment, supplies, and training.Non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs and risk of chronic kidney disease-related outcomes: a meta-analysis.
